Mr. Lova pointed out that so far as the shareholders were concerned they had, unfortunately, lost their money. Whether any person could be held responsible for the vote to taking proceedings against the directors or any one of them was a question for the creditors.

The CHAIRMAN stated in answer to a further question, that the Board of Trade wanted to upset the present voluntary liquidation if they could. He judged that not one of them would do this. He had not done so. He had asked the Board of Trade through proper channels to bring about a compulsory liquidation, whether the creditors for the most part liked it or not.

Mr. DAWKINS then thought the shareholders could only order the winding up of the company. He believed that the directors had committed a mistake, but from the very first, apparently, the affairs of the new bank had not been honest.
